

Vaccinations are a crucially important part of managing the pandemic and increasing vaccination levels enables the gradual return of free movement, including air travel.

You can be sure that no such discussions are taking place amongst airlines to ban or prevent vaccinated or un-vaccinated travellers from flying.

On the contrary, airlines in Europe are pushing for non-discrimination amongst tested/vaccinated/non-vaccinated as far as restrictions and free movement are concerned.

Vaccination certificates, as well as the Digital COVID Certificate (DCC) in Europe, are already playing an important role in enabling safe travel, and they will be increasingly used as more and more countries begin easing travel restrictions.

There is unfortunately a lot of misinformation distributed online about vaccinations and air travel, so it's important to set the record straight on this.
